Montana's CWD Management Plan – Proposed

FWP has developed a three-part action-specific plan for surveillance for Chronic Wasting Disease (CWD), a management response to finding it, and a plan to inform the public about the disease, the risk it poses to Montana's wildlife, and the necessary actions to manage it. These specific actions are covered by Environmental Assessments of 2005 and 2013. Surveillance will sample animals at hunter check stations in areas where CWD is closest to our borders. Because we do not have enough money or staff to look for CWD everywhere in the state, we will annually rotate through high-priority areas in south-central, southeast and northern Montana. When CWD is found, we need to find out its prevalence in the local herd and the geographical extent of the infection. Since there are no reliable tests for live animals, we propose to use public hunting to sample animals in a Special CWD Hunt within about a 10-mile radius around the initial detection called the Initial Response Area (IRA). We may have to sample about 150 – 300-plus animals to accurately determine disease prevalence, depending on the size of the local herd. The plan also speaks to the long-term management of the area, which will depend on the prevalence and distribution found during the Special CWD Hunt. Perhaps the most important part is a public information plan to inform and educate hunters, landowners, political office holders and the public about the very real risk CWD poses to our wildlife and economy, and how we propose to manage it.
